I strongly support efforts to reduce government waste; however, preserving the integrity of the amateur radio bands requires maintaining rigorous testing standards. It is essential to uphold both the written examination and returning to the Morse code proficiency testing, including reinstating Element One as part of the licensing process. Amateur radio should not be allowed to deteriorate into the unregulated state of the citizens band, where a lack of oversight has compromised order and quality. I dedicated significant time and effort to earning my Amateur Extra license, and I believe maintaining high standards is crucial to protecting the technical excellence and operational discipline that define the amateur radio community.
